Research Interests

My interests focus on the effects of human-made (or anthropogenic) noise on aquatic life, with particular focus on effects of such sounds on fishes. This interest allows me to take advantage of my decades of basic research on fish hearing capabilities and mechanisms and apply them to issues that have the potential to directly affect behavior and physiology of animals as the noise levels in the aquatic environment increases.

Recent studies have included effects of very intense man-made signals (pile driving, seismic air guns) as well as general increase in background noise levels (as from shipping and aquaculture). I also am very involved in working with U.S. and international institutions in evaluating overall effects of the increase in man-made noise on animals. This includes being organizer of six international meetings on effects of noise on aquatic life. Until recently I was senior editor (and founder) of the 77 volume Springer Handbook of Auditory Research and I am the editor of the science and technology magazine of the Acoustical Society of America, Acoustics Today.
